

Shaken, easy on the ice

Scientists have worked out how to boil liquids by shaking them a million times faster than the flap of a hummingbird's wings. The process, using ultra-fast vibrations to heat tiny amounts of liquid, could help improve systems that prevent the build-up of ice on planes and wind turbines, according to researchers at the University of Edinburgh.

